CONTRIBUTION STATEMENT

My research concerns how institutions shape consumer norms, values, and practices. My contributions to consumer behavior come from using institutional theory and the method of automated text analysis to investigate market emergence. In "Semiotic Structure and the Legitimation of Consumption Practices: The Case of Casino Gambling," (Journal of Consumer Research, 2010), I investigate the cultural process by which consumption practices are legitimated over time. Through text analysis of newspaper reporting, I show that a gradual change in the language used to discuss casino gambling paved the way for market emergence. This work won the Sidney J. Levy award for outstanding work in CCT in 2010. In "Megamarketing: Market Creation as a Social Process," published in the Journal of Marketing (2010), I complement this approach by applying these insights to understand megamarketing. This research was published as the lead article in the Journal of Marketing and was runner-up for the Harold H. Maynard Award for best article of the year.

With Kathy LaTour, I extend this understanding to individual cognitive structures to understand how media framing shapes perceptions of legitimacy on an implicit, individual level (Humphreys and LaTour 2013). In "Branding Disaster: Reestablishing Trust through the Ideological Containment of Systemic Risk Anxieties," with Craig Thompson, we show how this process contains consumer anxieties about risk following a crisis, in a comparative analysis of the Exxon vs. BP oil spills (Humphreys and Thompson 2014) that innovates by adding visual content analysis. This article was selected as lead article in the Journal of Consumer Research.

In my current work continues to investigate market emergence and change, but has expanded to include the areas of social media and sustainability. I also continue to be involved in institutionalizing the method of text analysis in consumer research through workshops, seminars, and publications, working with scholars in both consumer psychology and CCT.
